

VALTER HUGO MÃE

(1971-)

Notwithstanding being mostly known to the public as a prose writer, what cannot be disregarded is the fact that Valter Hugo Mãe possesses fourteen poetry books, assembled in Folclore Íntimo [Intimate Folklore] (2008) and Contabilidade [Accountancy] (2010).

A personal and explicit conception about Europe seems more evident in the prose than in the poetry of this author, that can be corroborated by the fact that, throughout Contabilidade, the term “Europe” does not appear, explicitly, a single time. However, if on the one hand, the poetry of Valter Hugo Mãe “is not an end in itself, but a creation laboratory, an extraordinary pantheon of improbable confidences” (Teixeira 2016: 55), on the other hand, the hybridism of the form bolsters the expansion of an ostranenie [defamiliarization] effect. It is then to the reader to use the interpretative mechanisms to manage to recover the subtle fragments of references to the European continent present in the work, through the description of characters, actions, or concrete objects.

It is, in fact, a metaphoric and dysphoric cosmovision, non-delimitative of territorial borders, but cultural and perceptive of the old continent, that I propose for the author’s poetry which is in turn satiric and taciturn.

VALTER HUGO MÃE

Concerning the Portuguese territory, Valter Hugo Mãe chooses to ironically describe an individual subject, resident in the country and clearly divided between the city and the countryside: “I get an advantage in / displaying an urbanity without exaggerations” (92), “there is in me a parochial soul, full / of landscape, beautiful extensions of green fields / and sand blonding in the sun” (idem). Maybe this same subject could represent a nostalgic and mournful Lusitan way of life.

Valter Hugo Mãe seeks the caricatural psychological description of me and the ironic narrative of his relationship with the collective, not only defining the essence of “Portugality”, but also denouncing some particularities of that very character, that seemingly, for him, lack regeneration as can be ascertained in the following passages: “aim at homesickness to / copy out the past and buy the future / on credit” (14), “the old lady inclined over my / afflicted head and said, something about milk, / flourish in the rye and lay your body / in the middle of the earth. Blood thing, / raise the body and walk” (51), “tired, we feel the hardship / of existence, anguish of not / knowing nothing essential about the human / being” (78). Finally, he concludes: “we have ideals of / shriveled people, even more so because we are / Portuguese, and we do not abdicate of a good drama / in order to complete ourselves in the moment in which / we are the fleeting centre of attentions” (95). This last excerpt can be assumed, not only as an unveiled critique to the Portuguese mode of action, but also as an alert to the urgency of rethinking the community’s mental paradigms.

In spite of the lexeme “Europe” never effectively appearing in the poems of Valter Hugo Mãe, I risk stating that the concept is latent in the stretches where he notes each individual’s suffering (and his subsequent restlessness with the finite me), as well as Man’s relation with Nature, or, in a more concrete way, with the countryside and manual work.

We highlight the following textual segments:

VALTER HUGO MÃE

distant and unfathomable as

trees, the workers

discovered the bodies and spread out in the fields

.

weedy beauty,

feet on the ground, waving sometimes or cleaning the sweat, aware that we were close (Mãe 2010: 179-180)

or also so that you

bury me like a seed

and never like a flower

VALTER HUGO MÃE

because I know everything tells me welcome to the entire world while I depart

(...)

I have already told you, in no tomb will my soul fit, I will leak through the remedied sizes with the consistency of things that may touch you (201-202).

In these brief excerpts, we find a certain melancholic tone. In the first, it is possible to perceive the intrinsic link between the mundane, and the earthly, and the human being, that dedicates himself intensely to be able to extract fruits from his work and feed those who depend upon him. In the second, the grief assumes itself as the central figure, given that death assumes its strength and erodes the bodily frontiers, separating the lovers. The following verses, complement this argumentation and expose a bloody trail:

The dead, God sent them to hell. hell was

was inside my

VALTER HUGO MÃE

head,

and they almost did not fit

.

I understood that,

If they died burnt, defleshed

in acid or mutilated bleeding as open taps

I wanted to see (181)

Valter Hugo Mãe does not limit, through the lyrical subject, the vestiges of human suffering to a closed space; he seems to have the need to expose it without any physic-spatial or reminiscent frontier, as a way of awareness: “I remember what / they said. That there were many of them, / butchered throughout / the square for no reason” (idem). In this context, one should note the fact that the empirical author assumes his disbelief in humanity and admits that, in his point of view, it “needs to learn somethings once and for all” (Mãe apud Silva, 2012), so that the hostile environment and the trails of blood left by the belicist moments do not happen again, in a “Europe that was promised to us [and] that is totally failing” (ibidem).

Brief Anthology

A BELEZA DANINHA

VALTER HUGO MÃE

(...)

We left the absolute nights, where the

beasts and the men

end up, we had the morning emergency,

clear by the sun evaporated out of the house to see the orchard. Only then would we restart

.

distant and unfathomable like the

trees, the workers

the workers

discovered the bodies and spread out in the fields.

.

Weedy beauty,

VALTER HUGO MÃE

Feet on the ground, waving

Sometimes or cleaning the

sweat, aware that we were close

.

but they did not realise how much we were their parasites, they were as solitary and ugly darkening everything around them

.

They carried the stones on their backs like

terrified machines

or monsters finally adult

.

sometimes,

they fell down the slope,

VALTER HUGO MÃE

they opened like eggs and lay frying in the sun

seen at their homes' windows they seemed to be resting or others vexing

virility like opponent adults

.

The dead, God sent them to hell. hell was

was inside my

head,

and they almost did not fit

I understood that,

VALTER HUGO MÃE

if they died burnt, defleshed

in acid or mutilated

bleeding as open taps

I wanted to see

.

(...)

Packs that barked all night

Sniffing blood

At the doors

(...)

Me smelling of blood

omnipresent

to infuriate the snouts

.

VALTER HUGO MÃE

dry in the sun, my grandmother hanging at the entrance as

as hanged earth

was a ghost

ours, the rosary

around the disarmed neck

.

magnificent were the strengths of the animals dragging ploughs, and the men between them like beams capable of undulating, giant exuberant beams and very insecure in love with the fury of the beasts were together intense silences, sulking

VALTER HUGO MÃE

very beautiful, in each day even more against us

(...)

I was a child who rotted,

manuring the house for the cypresses plantation

.

(...)

Disposed the hands between the snouts, the fingers like campfire where they burnt and anyone else who saw her would be next to spill blood at the mouth of the pack

VALTER HUGO MÃE

.
I remember what they said. That there were many, butchered by the square without a reason, I went to see them according to my revelry to my desire

.
(...)

in Contabilidade (2010: 179-188)

Selected active bibliography

MÃE, Valter Hugo (2010), Contabilidade, Carnaxide, Alfabeta.

Selected critical bibliography

MAFFEI, Luis (2016), "Valter em Versos", in AA.VV., Nenhuma Palavra é Exata: Estudos sobre a obra de Valter Hugo Mãe, Porto, Porto Editora: 25-36.

SILVA, João Céu e (2012), "«Seria ingénuo pensar que o governo pudesse salvar-nos»", in Diário de Notícias, www.dn.pt/artes/interior/seria-ingenuo-pensar-que-o-governo-pudesse-salvar-nos-2921933.html (last access in 7/01/2018).

VALTER HUGO MÃE

TEIXEIRA, José Rui (2016), “Feito de amar entre os homens apenas as coisas mais efémeras: Leituras da poesia de Valter Hugo Mãe”, in AA.VV., Nenhuma Palavra é Exata: Estudos sobre a obra de Valter Hugo Mãe, Porto, Porto Editora: 50-59.

Cristina Oliveira Ramos (trans. Rui Miguel Ribeiro)

How to quote this entry:

RAMOS, Cristina Oliveira (2018), “valter hugo mãe”, trans. Rui Miguel Ribeiro, in Europe Facing Europe: poets write Europe. ISBN 978-989-99999-1-6. <https://aeuropafaceaeuropa.ilcml.com/en/term/valter-hugo-mae-3/>